

ABSTRACT

An odor discrimination method and device for an electronic nose system including olfactory pattern classification based on a binary spiking neural network with the capability to handle many sensor inputs in a noise environment while recognizing a large number of potential odors. The spiking neural networks process a large number of inputs arriving from a chemical sensor array and implemented with efficient use of chip surface area.